What is an enzyme?

Enzymes are the protein molecules responsible for certain functions in the body such as food digestion, building bones and tissues, and aiding in detoxification. In his book "Food Enzymes", Dr. Humbart Santillo gives the analogy that proteins are the light bulb and enzymes are the electrical current which lights up the bulb. Enzymes are essential for life.

Why do we need enzymes?

Every living thing naturally has the enzymes it needs to break itself down. This is a delicate and necessary part in the life cycle. In the natural realm, as plants decompose they fertilize the soil with vitamins and minerals, giving seedlings the nutrients they need to thrive. These sprouts are extremely high in enzymes. As these plants become food for livestock, they continue to break down in the digestive process allowing the recipient to receive their nutritional value. This cycle has been the basis of survival since the beginning of time. Man's discovery of fire, while beneficial for so many things, inadvertently destroyed the fragile link that unlocks the potential of our food. Heat kills enzymes, which makes it very difficult for the body to maintain proper functions.

Supplemental Enzymes for Health

For proper digestion to occur, the following enzymes are required:

Protease:

For digestion of Protein

Amylase:

For digestion of Carbohydrates

Lipase:

For digestion of Fats

Cellulase:

For digestion of Dietary Fiber

Lactase:

For digestion of Dairy Products

"The energy to blink the eye, to move a finger, to take a breath; the nerve signals that make the heart beat... depends on an intricately choreographed interplay of energy... Each of these finely tuned chemical reactions that make us a piece of work depends on helper substances called Enzymes to speed up (or catalyze) the reaction."

Dr. Mary Dan Eades

Supplemental Enzymes for the Body

The primary reason to take supplemental digestive enzymes today is to help replace those that were destroyed in some manner, such as with heat, processing and irradiation. While it is true that our bodies can produce digestive enzymes, when we eat enzyme deficient food, our bodies have to produce a higher quantity. This causes a corresponding decrease in metabolic enzyme potential. Over time, this constant depletion of enzymes can affect the body's ability to maintain optimum organ function, and can lead to degenerative process. By supplementing with digestive enzymes, we can take the digestive load off of our body's enzyme production and allow the body to use those enzymes to optimize organ function.

Supplemental Enzymes for Digestion

Supplementing with digestive enzymes leads to complete digestion, as naturally occurring food enzymes and supplemental food enzymes begin the process of digestion earlier in the digestive tract. Exposure to pancreatic enzymes is only possible after the food leaves the stomach. This means that digestion is beginning in the small intestine, where the system should be assimilating nutrients. The chance of undigested food entering the colon is increased, leading to putrefaction and the toxins, gas and discomfort that this putrefaction produces.
